Before:

- ❖ The orders live in tables that are not responsive and are cumbersome for editors to work with, leading to frequent formatting errors.
- ❖ The only way to search for an order is to use the browser's Find tool.
- ❖ The definitions take up too much room on the page and push the important content (the orders themselves) down.

After:

- ❖ I replaced the old HTML tables with new, responsive Bootstrap data tables. Users can now search for specific orders or filter entries by location, name, owner's name, year, or penalty amount.
- ❖ Content editors now add entries via a data entry tool in the sites back end rather than editing directly in the page, reducing the chance for code errors.
- ❖ The definitions have been moved into an accordion tool so that they take up less room on the page but are still easily accessible.
